This Catalogue cancels all previous lists.

Herbs are easy to grow. They demand no fancy mixtures and are quite happy in any average soil.

Most herbs prefer full sun but a few, like Mint, Chervil, Sweet Cicely, Angelica, Sweet Woodruff and Water Cress, require partial shade for energetic growth.

Select a spot convenient to the kitchen for growing your herbs; if that isn't possible, the plants can be set out in the vegetable garden or placed here and there in the flower bed or rock garden.

There are endless ways of planting herbs. The plan or design need not be elaborate or pretentious but must suit your location and needs. Even a tiny herb plot, like a small vegetable or flower garden, is making life happier for many a cook.

The English traditional design with simple, orderly rectangular beds is attractive and easy to maintain.

For a slight variation an old ladder may be used; the "steps" marking tiny separate beds. If there is enough space two or three of these ladders may be grouped making an interesting design or herb-garden when held together with a low hedge or border.

In place of a ladder, one could use an old wagon wheel. Place herbs between the spokes in a circular design using three or four varieties. The center, or hub, could contain a large bushy plant and the outer edge bordered with low-growing plants. Either of these are easily cared for year after year.

A Strawberry jar or "lip-pot" is unusual and interesting with herbs planted in each open space or lip; also, terrace or window boxes filled with assorted fragrant and culinary herbs are most attractive and have the added advantage of being easily moved indoors for winter use. These herb arrangements need not be confined to the kitchen. They are so decorative and conversational, you will be delighted to have them in any room of the house.

As far as possible herbs, like fruits and vegetables, should be used fresh for they impart a more subtle flavor to cooked and uncooked foods and add variety to Every Day meals.

Fresh Herbs can turn a plain dish into a Gourmet's delight!
